New Online Archive on Racially Segregated Libraries

Matthew R. Griffis
University of Southern Mississippi, matthew.griffis@usm.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://aquila.usm.edu/rocinformationandresources

Part of the African American Studies Commons, Library and Information Science Commons, Oral History Commons, and the Public History Commons

Recommended Citation
https://aquila.usm.edu/rocinformationandresources/9

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the The Roots of Community at The Aquila Digital Community. It has been accepted for inclusion in Publications and Other Resources by an authorized administrator of The Aquila Digital Community. For more information, please contact Joshua.Cromwell@usm.edu.
New Online Archive on Racially Segregated Libraries

Matthew Griffis
Assistant Professor, School of Library and Information Science
The University of Southern Mississippi
matthew.griffis@usm.edu

Abstract: Matthew Griffis (matthew.griffis@usm.edu), Ph.D., an Assistant Professor in the School of Library and Information Science at the University of Southern Mississippi, has conducted extensive research as the lead investigator on racial segregation in public libraries in the South. His research has been digitized and is now available online. The archive, made possible in part by the Institute of Museum and Library Services, is entitled “The Roots of Community: Segregated Carnegie Libraries as Spaces for Learning and Community-Making in Pre-Civil Rights America, 1900-65.” Griffis’s primary area of research is the library as place, including library buildings as social architecture, public libraries as community spaces, and the history of libraries and librarianship in North America; he also studies the history of postcards and postcard collecting and qualitative research methods in Library and Information Science.

The Roots of Community project examines the history of the twelve segregated Carnegie libraries (or “Carnegie Negro libraries”, as they were then called), a group of public libraries that opened between 1900 and 1925 and were an official extension of Andrew Carnegie’s (and later the Carnegie Corporation of New York’s) well-known library building program. These libraries opened in Atlanta, GA; Greensboro, NC; Houston, TX; Knoxville, TN; Louisville, KY (2 libraries); Meridian, MS; Mound Bayou, MS; Nashville, TN; New Orleans, LA; and Savannah, GA. Only one segregated Carnegie library opened in a northern community: Evansville, IA. For as many as six decades these libraries served as learning spaces for African Americans in the pre-Civil Rights American South. By the 1970s, most had closed or were integrated into the formerly white people-only public library systems of their larger communities.

Little published research exists about them, however. And while public historians, researchers, and students of various academic and professional fields will likely benefit from knowing more about them—where they existed, how they were governed and managed, what guidelines or expectations they had to follow as a result of accepting Carnegie’s funding—these twelve libraries’ stories also have great potential to help today’s library professionals better understand how library users, especially those from marginalized groups, create and sustain a sense of community among members as well as within the larger community outside of the library space.

However, while Carnegie’s library grant program flourished, free library services to African Americans in the United States were still limited (Musmann, 1998; Carmichael, 2005), especially in the pre-Civil Rights South where segregation laws (also known as “Jim Crow laws”, a term used to describe the US state laws passed in the 1890s onward that legislated the separation of Black people from white people in the South in housing, public education, public facilities, and other areas) prevailed. In most southern communities, attitudes of white people summarily dismissed the need for library service of any kind for Black people (Bobinski, 1969). Although segregated libraries were not uncommon then, there were not many (Battles, 2009) and only eleven communities in the United States opened libraries for African Americans through Carnegie’s program. The Carnegie segregated libraries were not just some of the few such libraries to occupy full, freestanding buildings in their communities (i.e., were not simply “Negro reading rooms” hidden away in the damp basements of the public libraries for white people), they were among some of the first free public libraries accessible to African Americans at a time when such resources were relatively unavailable (Battles, 2009). And, as extensions of the broader Carnegie library grant program, these twelve libraries would have been subject to many of the same conditions of governance, taxation, and maintenance that Carnegie’s program typically imposed upon communities accepting his gifts (Jones, 1997). This alone makes these libraries landmarks of civic history and creates, for the interested researcher, a basis for endless (and interesting) comparisons between the whites-only Carnegie libraries and their segregated counterparts the same city or community.

Become a Participant

Did you ever use any of the segregated Carnegie libraries examined in this project (possibly the libraries in Houston [TX], Louisville, Knoxville, New Orleans, Meridian, Atlanta, Savannah [GA], Nashville, or Evansville)?

If so, you may wish to donate an oral history interview to the project. The interview would be audio-recorded and would focus on your memories of the library, its librarians, its users, and its larger community at the time.

All interview participants are offered a $25 bookstore gift-card in return for sharing their memories. Completed interviews will be accessible for the researchers and the general public via the University of Southern Mississippi’s online digital collections. If interested, please email the researcher directly at matthew.griffis@usm.edu, call 601-266-5502 (please provide your name, and phone number).

Acknowledgement

This project was made possible in part by the Institute of Museum and Library Services, grant #RE-31-16-0044-16. The views, findings, conclusions or recommendations in this article do not necessarily represent those of the Institute of Museum and Library Services.

Works Cited

Documentary Sources

Andrew Carnegie, Race and Libraries

Anderson, Sarah A. “‘The Place to Go’: The 135th Street Branch Library and the Harlem Renaissance,” The Library Quarterly 73, no. 4: 383-421.

Work, Monroe N. Negro Year Book: An Annual Encyclopedia of the Negro 1921-1922. Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, 1922.

Civil Rights, Education and Libraries

Mississippi and Libraries

Fenton, Michele T. Little Known Black Librarian Facts. 4th ed. Indianapolis, IN: Little Known Black Librarian Facts, 2013.

Atlanta Libraries

“Interesting Library Exhibit Planned for Southeastern Fair.” Atlanta Constitution: Atlanta, August 19, 1917.